

To Whom it May Concern:

I am writing in response to your proposal to allow cell phone usage on commercial airline flights. Please, whatever you decide, do not allow this to happen. As a frequent business traveler I recognize the need to increase productivity aboard aircrafts, but allowing cellular phone usage is no the answer. It is frustrating enough to be traveling on a cramped flight. Having to listen to 50 plus people all talking at the same time in a confined space would be a great inconvenience to all on board. If your concern is productivity of business travelers, then consider implementing internet access aboard planes so that those travelers interested in staying connected could still do so. But, please, do not torture every air traveler by forcing them to listen to constant conversation for the duration of all of their flights.

Thank you.
